This probably belongs earlier in your work, but I think it important enough to lodge it now at the risk of it being dismissed.

AUST R AND AUST L

These statements are very often hidden in a corner, or in unreadable type or colour or near the absolute minimum size.

I can't understand why the marketers are so ashamed of them. I would have thought that the average user would take comfort in knowing that the TGA had had a look at the product and could find its owner at a moment's notice in case of a problem.

I would suggest that some fresh attention be given to this, bearing in mind that only if a change appears in the Order and the change is made well known will anything happen.

I would also like to see or hear some public statements about the AUST L or R: I know that advertising is expensive but maybe it could be on the list of things to inject into an interview or conversation; even letters to the press once a year would help, but if you could get something into the women's magazines to counteract the snake oil ads it would be even better.
